"ARGENT" EXHIBIT AT MUSEUM IN MARCH

An exhibit of professional photographer's works depicting the environment and inhabitants of southwest Florida will be on exhibit at the Museum this month, opening March 21.

Argent is a loosely knit group of photographers interested in furthering the growth of serious photography in southwest Florida.

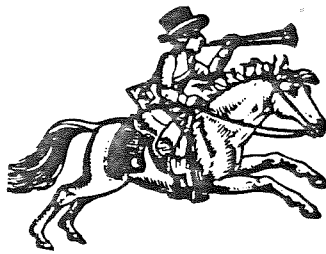

The photographers represented in this first group show work in a wide variety of photographic styles, but a common concern for excellence in the photographic medium is evidenced.

Argent has no officers, dues or bylaws, but members do meet to view current work, discuss common problems and interests and generally enliven the spirits of the creative photographic community.

Fisher's works on exhibit until March 18

An exhibit of wildlife paintings by Naples artist Phil Fisher, "Our Wildlife Legacy will continue on exhibit until March 18, in observance of Endangered Species Awareness week. Declared by Governor Bob Graham, the week of March 12-19 will be observed throughout the state. Several of Fisher's paintings depict the endangered species of Florida, the Florida panther in particular. Half of the proceeds of any paintings sold during this period will be donated to Endangered Species Research Foundation, to continue to support efforts to preserve our wildlife heritage.

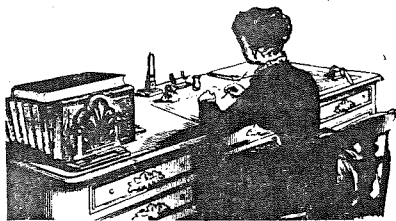

Prints of the Florida panther, "Felis Concolor Coryi," by Fisher are available at the Museum, in addition to Endangered Species T-shirts.

BOOK REVIEW

My Work among the Florida Seminoles. By James Lafayette Glenn, edited with an introduction by Harry A. Kersey, Jr. (Gainesville: The University Presses of Florida, 1982. xiii, 121 pp. Forward, introduction, photographs, index. $12.00)

In 1931 the minister of the Church in Everglades City, James L. Glenn, was appointed head of the Seminole agency in Dania. During his seven years at Everglades, Glenn had become well-known to the Indians, often photographing them and their villages and recording his impressions in a journal. The report that is now being published was written around 1946. Using his own reports combined with other material, Glenn produced an extended, rambling commentary organized around sixty snapshots taken between 1928 and 1935.

The editor has provided a competent brief summary of Glenn's work as agent and a few informative notes to his text. One can obtain from this volume an impression of the duties and problems Glenn faced. He was an authoritarian, hard-working superintendent of an under-staffed and under-funded agency trying to provide medical, legal, and economic assistance during the Depression years to a very widely scattered and largely independent Seminole population, one still very suspicious of the federal government and wary of all whites. The Seminole were already a tourist attraction, to Glenn's disgust, but were not yet recognized as a resource or a responsibility by state or local governments.

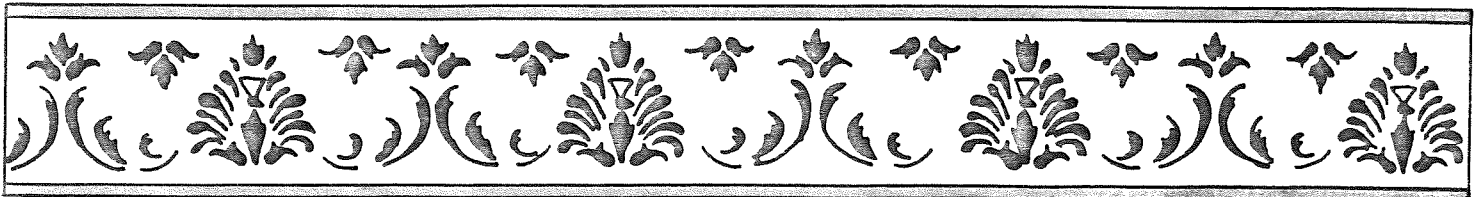

On balance, Glenn probably helped the Seminoles, especially, as Kersey suggests, by acquiring land for the Brighton and Big Cypress reservations and starting the cattle program there. However, the developments in education and employment that profoundly changed Seminole life began largely ten years after his term, while the origins of the current political scene, the organization of the two modern Florida Indian tribes and of their two BIA agencies, lie more than twenty years later.
